

What is your opinion about children using phones? Some people believe that children should be banned from using mobile devices. Other people feel differently about young people using this kind of technology: they believe that these devices can be a helpful and useful tool for children. There are many reasons why people have different views about this issue. In this discussion text, I will examine some of the different attitudes toward children using mobile phones.

It is important to consider that mobile phones can be distracting. This could make it even harder for children to focus on their learning. Additionally, this type of technology is addictive (meaning that people find it hard to stop using them). This might mean that young people end up spending less quality time talking to their families. It is also worth noting that they are expensive. This money could be spent on more educational items such as books.

On the other hand, you can use mobile phones to contact friends and family easily. This is especially important during lockdown. Likewise, these devices can be extremely useful in an emergency: you could use them to contact someone urgently. What is more, school pupils can use their mobile phones to set reminders. This might actually help children to remember to complete home learning.

For years people have discussed whether phones should be banned. Recently, this has become a very important issue – especially since lockdown has prevented families from seeing each other in person. Hopefully, this text has demonstrated that, despite the many problems that phones may create, they should not be banned.
